

Is India the ideal destination to outsource translation work?

With 210 nationals living in India and well connected, translation outsourcing to Indian companies are a growing phenomenon; The cost of translation is almost 50% of what it is prevailing in the US or in the European union; As internet doing the magic, more and more companies in the US and Europe are enjoying substantial savings.

Coimbatore, Tamil Nadu, February 14, 2007 /India PRwire/ -- Imagine, if the nations of the world spoke one language. With the so called globalization, we are put into a stage where countries worldwide are brought below a single ceiling. With this comes the problem of communication, as the number of languages in the world outnumbers the number of countries. The only thing that can bridge this gap of communication is efficient translation. What else can bring in more understanding than getting to learn about the technicalities involved through regional language? This is what which has resulted in the greater demand for language translation. Today, one can see many countries and multinationals outsourcing translation works. Rumors are strife that in few years India can become one of the leading providers of translation work with the efficient resource that is has.

With the booming IT sector of India, There is a visible increase in the number of nationalists who visit the country for outsourcing work. It is not only the cheaper cost of work that lures nationalists here, but also the perfection and professionalism that the Indian experts adapt. What enables India to achieve this distinction? What is the driving force behind this achievement? The answers are revealed here. In India, every year about 3000 people are added to the list of populace who shows interest in learning foreign language. Thus, the capable resources are multiplied every year in the country.
